The Passing Away of a Famous Georgia Servant.

Atlanta Journat: "Old Uncle Brit," the true and tried, is dead. He was the colored servant of Colonel J. R. Macalla who refused to accept his freedom and declared he would never leave old master and mistress until he "went away foot foremost." He was "faithful among the many faithfuless found." His love for his old master and mistress speaks volumes both for him and them. It shows the kindly telations often existing between master and slave before the war. For the last several years he has been tenderly cared for and fed from the table of the Macalla family. And when he died the family and community stood around his grave in the old family hurying ground with bowed heads and moistened eyes. They felt that the list link was sone between the past and the present.

The poor old negro for 89 years filled his humble place with fidelity and has left behird him a name fragrant with deeds of kindness and an example worthy the imitation of many occupying exalted positions in church and state. H. L. Atlanta Journal: "Old Uncle Brit," the
